Output Problem

Throughout our interviews with individuals at the Chabad, we found that the main output problem is a lack of funding. The limited available capital is the main catalyst for most of the issues that we have observed at the Chabad. Dealing with the funding issue first would solve other problems such as staffing constraints.

Our Recommendations

When considering the critical output problems faced by the Chabad, we are looking to address the lack of funding, which appears to be the underlying cause of many other issues. Our first recommendation has to do with creating a reliable alumni network. We suggest that the Chabad starts keeping a contact record of the individuals who frequent the Chabad, as well as the alumni who have already graduated.

Alumni Network

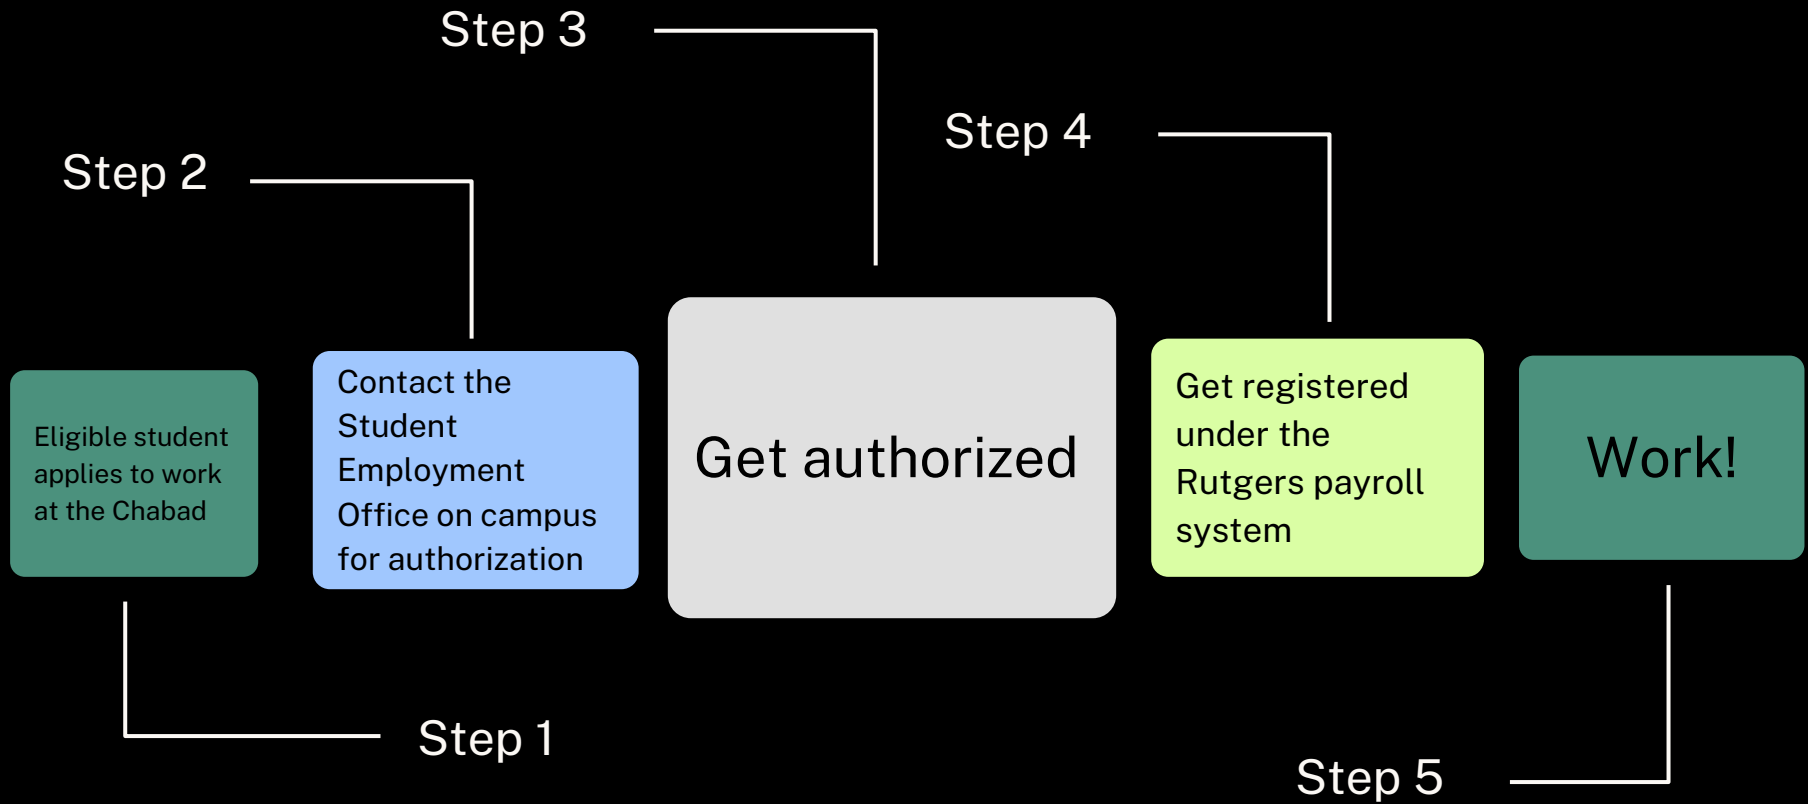

Alumni Network

The Chabad can maintain engagement through newsletters and updates to connected alumni. This keeps them informed of the organization's activities and developments. The network can be used as a platform for affiliates to connect and communicate with one another, building relationships and creating value for each member. The alumni database can send invitations for reunions and future events, strengthening the community bonds. By nurturing these connections, alumni are likely to support the Chabad's mission through donations and contributions, helping sustain the organization's services.

The issue of funding also affects the manpower available at the Chabad. Inadequate funding prevents the Chabad from hiring a larger work staff. A solution to this problem of manpower is to register as part of the Federal Work Study Program. Rutgers offers subsidized student service wages, containing sections specifically for Off-Campus Community Jobs

Why Alumni Network?

The use of an alumni network ties back to our course concept about teaming. More specifically, it deals with the idea of context. Alumni who have experienced Chabad's services at Rutgers firsthand understand its role in supporting the Jewish student body.

Outcomes of Alumni Network

This understanding motivates them to donate, ensuring future students can benefit from the same experiences they had. The result is a recurring cycle of charity: Chabad serves current students who, upon graduating, give back to support the organization's mission and services.

Connect to Alumni Network

The alumni also benefit from a community of trust. Having personally benefited from Chabad's services, alumni can contribute with confidence, knowing their donations directly support meaningful community initiatives.

Alumni Network

The Chabad acquiring employees through the FWS program alleviates the cost of hiring new employees. This leaves additional funds to be allocated elsewhere, while also solving the staffing issue. The FWS solution ties back to our course concepts of ERG theory, which states that employees have a need for growth, existence, and relatedness.

FWS offers various payroll plans for its employees. By providing students with paid jobs, their basic socio-economic existence is being supported. FWS offers financial security without excessive strain. Student payroll averages at about $17.53 per hour.

Lastly, is the idea of relatedness. Many students who are currently in the FWS program are getting jobs that connect you to many individuals who have similar needs and interests.
